THE LOVE FEAST.

An amber-shaded lamp shed its honey glow over the Temples' living room. Peace and reconciliation were in the air so that even a stranger coming in must have scented it.

"It's good to have you back," said David, looking up from a batch of papers he was going over carefully with a fountain pen, cutting sentences here, adding a word or a punctuation mark there.

"If I told you I was at that minute thinking how blessed it is to be back," said Cora with a demure smile, "you'd think me a gross little sentimentalist. I was just telling myself for the hundredth time how much more I love you, Dave, since you came around to the—human viewpoint about the Rourke outfit. I—I couldn't love a man, Dave, who had nothing of womanly tenderness in him—no compromise at all."

"Humph!" grunted the man across the living room table. "I'll never have done with that crowd till I find a way of keeping them politically decent. Womanly tenderness be—"

His last word was drowned in a whirr from the telephone.

"Gosh hang it! who's that? I'm not in the mood for callers—"

Cora, at the telephone, turned to ward him with dancing eyes. "It's Dr. Hartley and Wanda," she whispered brightly. "He says he's got wonderful news for you. They're downstairs—and coming right up."

Three minutes later every one was talking wildly, shaking hands, dancing about the room, laughing, squealing, offering congratulations—for the two had come to tell David of his appointment as tenement house commissioner.

"The mayor," said Dr. Hartley, making David a mock obeisance, followed by a mighty slap on the back, "bids me offer you this post. You are to appear at his office tomorrow morning for more formal acceptance. How about it, old fellow? Guess the City club's pushing power is something to reckon with, hey, son?"

"Isn't it a dream come true?" cried Cora, with glistering eyes. "Now you'll have weapons to fight the Rourkes with, Dave, if they start anything crooked again. Oh, thank God! thank God!" she breathed from a profoundly grateful heart.

Wanda gripped David's hands, looking steadily into his eyes for an unwavering moment. "Dear old friend," she said briefly, "I'm so glad." And, Cora, watching the woman she honestly liked, yet who had caused her the keenest suffering a wife can know, saw with thanksgiving that Wanda's gaze soon turned from David and settled proudly upon "her man."

The splendid doctor who had loved her so long in vain. Her heart was fully in the keeping of Hartley now, Cora knew. She was even conscious of a tiny gleam of amusement as she noted, as woman can, that Wanda regarded her fiancé as the superior man, the man of power, wealth, of mighty influence and esteem.

Through Wanda Laurence's mind, strangely enough, the same thought was passing—the little gleam of amusement that Cora so obviously regarded "her man." David, as the supreme man, the good sport, the champion of right and honesty.

And so both women rejoiced and were exceedingly glad.

David himself said little. Quite simply.

Soup Specials

Okra Soup.—In one of my previous installments I spoke in detail upon soups, but since then, at the urgent request of our mutual friend, Myrtle Stedman, who presented me with this recipe, I decided to give it a "try-out," as we say about the studio. The result was so gratifying that I decided to offer it to my readers. There are not many of us who are acquainted with an okra, which is not an animal, but a vegetable, that when served to us in hotels and restaurants, is usually disguised beyond recognition.

Four hours before the soup is needed, put in a large narrow-bone with plenty of meat and gristle on it, and three quarts of water. When about to boil skim well. One hour after starting soup add one tablespoonful of salt and three pints of tender okra that have been washed and sliced. One hour later add six large tomatoes peeled and sliced, two heaping teaspoonfuls of raw rice, one-half teaspoonful of black pepper and one large onion sliced, also 12 cloves and allspice tied in a cloth. Half hour before serving the soup add six ears of young corn cut from the cob and two heaping teaspoonfuls of sugar. Ten minutes before serving let the soup boil uncovered, but be sure and keep it well covered before this time so as to be sure and retain its flavor, therefore a large saucpan is needed to prevent the boiling over. Every time ingredients are added it will stop boiling, so watch carefully that it boils again quickly. It must be stirred occasionally to prevent scorching and sticking. After it once boils only a moderate fire is needed to keep it going.

Crab Gumbo.—Colin Chase also recently offered me a recipe which he received from his mother down south, for crab gumbo soup. It is rather difficult to make, but if you will follow the directions very carefully you will have success. Two tablespoonfuls of butter of poultry fat, one large onion, three-quarter pound of boiled ham, one medium size green pepper, 12 crab bodies, three tablespoonfuls of Worcester sauce, two tablespoonfuls of canned, one quart of picked shrimp fresh or canned, one small red pepper, two teaspoonfuls of salt, and one quart of tomatoes fresh or canned.

Blend butter and flour till well mixed, then stir in onion cut in small pieces, cook until yellow, then add okra (cut in pieces if fresh), stir this until somewhat dry and add ham.

Cook a few minutes, then add shrimp, tomatoes (cut small), peppers cut fine, and crab bodies broken in four pieces each. Then add salt and sauce and enough water to cover, stirring all the while.

In serving pass boiled rice with the gumbo. If the shrimps are canned, do not put in until 15 minutes before gumbo is done, or they will cook to pieces. When all finished you will find it a whole meal in itself and only desert need be used in connection with it.

J. HAM LEWIS IS GIVEN AN OVATION

Seattle, Sept. 29.—Senator J. Hamilton Lewis of Illinois, who was elected to congress from this state twenty years ago, and who left Seattle for Chicago fifteen years ago, received an ovation when he was introduced to address a big Wilson and Marshall meeting here tonight.

The senator reviewed the achievements of the Democratic administration and then discussed at length Charles E. Hughes' criticism of the railroad settlement, saying:

"Judge Hughes says there should have been arbitration. I answer that there was no law in existence providing for arbitration. There was no law to enforce any arbitration. I remind Judge Hughes that his party came into power after Cleveland, at the end of the great Pullman strike.

"They were also in power when the telegraphers had their universal strike. But his party passed no law to prevent a revolution of such strikes or to provide arbitration. I ask Judge Hughes—under what law was there to be arbitration? Who were to be the arbitrators? And what does he say could have been done to prevent the strike while had been progressing for months without success continued?"

"Justice Hughes says the people will pay. Why will the people pay any more than they have been paying? The railroads have always made the people pay. The last returns by the railroads, made under oath, show that for the first railroad year, ending the first of last month, fifty-five railroads, one-third of the total in the United States, had made net over one billion dollars. If it be true, as they claim, that fifty millions are to be taken from the public to pay the increased wages under the eight-hour

Senator Lewis will rest here tomorrow and proceed to San Francisco Sunday.
